THE SLAVERY AND ABOLITION COLLECTIONS

Historically, slavery and abolition in the United States represent opposite sides of the same shield. They were both intimately connected with the expansion of Europe, the rise of modern capitalism—and each other. When the New World was discovered, its limitless land areas cried for exploitation. This, of course, required enormous capital and labor.

In attempting to answer the first question posed by the Americans, three sources were tapped: the labor of the American Indian, the imported African, and the European immigrant. Contrary to popular conception, kidnapping, indenture, and slave purchase were practiced by the traders in acquiring laborers from Europe as well as from Africa. Prof. Lorenzo J. Greene and others have discovered cases where red, white, and black slaves were sold from the same American auction block. However, color, availability, and the social sanctions made inevitable the triumph of Negro slavery over these two others.

One answer to the problem of capital was furnished by the huge profits reaped from the slave trade. The studies of Wilson Williams and Eric Williams of Howard University are documenting the large degree to which the rise of modern capitalism in Western Europe was dependent upon the traffic in human flesh. Piracy and the seizure of the Inca and Aztec treasures in Mexico and Peru were related sources.

In the United States economics and climate gave American Negro slavery, in time, a sectional character. Even within these limits, the concentration was so definite that by 1860 it could be said that 10 per cent of the families owned 90 per cent of the slaves. As with all economic systems there were a political superstructure and a crown of ideology which made what was profitable, right by and a crown of ideology which made what was profitable, right by law, custom, and ethics. One absurd point in the pro-slavery argument was that the snake in the Garden of Eden was indeed a man against the Negro which filled the ante-bellum press.

Naturally, in every slave trading country, there arose an abolition movement. Among groups whose economic interests were not threatened (in some instances aided) by the anti-slavery effort, such a spirit flourished. Moreover, apart from the economic orientation, Eighteenth Century rationalism and the Rights of Man theory of the French and American Revolutions as well as the original Christian ethic gave impetus to the idea of the equality and brotherhood of all men. Thus, in France, Gregoire, Lafayette, Condorcet and Brissot de Warville were leaders of the “Friends of the Blacks.” In England Thomas Clarkson,* William Wilberforce,* and Granville Sharp* headed a similar crusade.

In America, as slavery became definitely Southern, the antislavery movement, in a converse manner, became Northern. By the third decade of the Nineteenth Century, the early, persuasive, emancipationist movement in the South was dead. And in the North, the effort under the leadership of Garrison,* Theodore Weld,* Frederick Douglass,* the Tappan brothers and the Grimke* sisters became positive and aggressive.

Historians are just now giving two elements their rightful place in this history: (1) the part played by the slave revolts and (2) the part the Negroes themselves played in the formal abolition movement. Thus, the Haitian Revolution, described elsewhere, was one of the few permanently successful slave revolutions in the history of the world. Gabriel Prosser, Denmark Vesey,* and Nat Turner,* American Negro insurrectionists, were aware of this tradition. Again, such periodicals as Freedom’s Journal, Walker’s Appeal and Frederick Douglass’ Paper and such leaders as Douglass,* Ward,* Pennington,* Garnet* were influential in the “Underground Railroad” from slavery to freedom and in the abolition conventions of the day. As every one knows, the final issue was decided by the American Civil War.

In the sense that anti-Negro propaganda, segregation, determination and exploitation have an historic base, modern egalitarianists and democrats may be considered the historical children of the abolitionists.

The two modest sets of documents here include slave sales, passes, certificates of registry, manumission papers, several wills and speeches. In addition, there are letters relating to the well-known Amistad mutiny and other slave cases which got into the courts.
